Summer 2011

A Vocation

Siobhan K. Phillips
Dickinson College

Follow this and additional works at: http://scholar.dickinson.edu/faculty_publications
Part of the English Language and Literature Commons, and the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation

This article is brought to you for free and open access by Dickinson Scholar. It has been accepted for inclusion by an authorized administrator. For more information, please contact scholar@dickinson.edu.
A Vocation

Siobhan Phillips

A human can be so afraid
the liver fails, a guest researcher tells me. I'm impressed. His accent tests a laugh-line: You are yellow, truly. Yes . . . We don't know why it happens yet, but give us time.
Or war. That's neuroscience data.

His was decades past. He left his violin behind; he came to grad school. Never picked it up again.
But still lights up at dinner, hailing
Oistrakh: his technique, his tone.
His thirst! So many shots—he mimes—before a show. So drunk he sits on stage—more gesture—sways. Then plays Prokofiev. Without a flaw.
I do not breathe, he adds. Years after, though, I take the tape and listen slow. He misses lots, his fingers slip. He just recovers fast, so fast your ears would never guess.

He sighs above his coffee. Practice cannot give you this. And I had none. I thought a student visa safer. I came here. I stopped, however, not for that. I lacked—a pause. It's years ago. And you?
What brought you to this topic, fear?

Siobhan Phillips is an assistant professor at Dickinson College and the author of The Poetics of the Everyday: Creative Repetition in Modern American Verse (Columbia UP). Her poems and essays have appeared in Southwest Review, Yale Review, Hudson Review, Literary Imagination, and other journals.