Poems My Father Taught Me

Carol Ann Johnston

Dickinson College

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholar.dickinson.edu/faculty_publications

Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation

This article is brought to you for free and open access by Dickinson Scholar. It has been accepted for inclusion by an authorized administrator. For more information, please contact scholar@dickinson.edu.
Poems My Father Taught Me

I. Once, when you poked your garden hose into a basket of geraniums hanging from the eave, out twirled a shining gray body, a frosty, fanged mouth.
You ran to get your hoe while he squirmed from the doused leaves, down the brick wall, away.
Tit for tat, you said;
one body in,
flushes another out.
You remember your mother snipped the head off many a moccasin.
Did she slip shears in her apron pocket just for that?

II. Crouched in your khakis, with a three-year-old me hanging down your back, you dig holes in earth
you have nourished
with peat, with moss, mysterious powders.
You drop in a daffodil—you pat it into the soil, as you pat your daughters into sleep.

III. Tonight, I find your picture in my bowl of photographs: edges of silver emulsion float your image in Times Square.
A photograph marking your escape from the city; your folded land sirened you home.
Still, I do not see New York without your image there; eighteen, so full of hope, so green.